Arrangers whose works are found in this collection include: Buddy Bregman, Benny Carter, Frank DeVol, Russ Garcia, Billy May, Marty Paich, Nelson Riddle, and Gerald Wilson. The arrangements consist of a combination of full scores and parts, and are often accompanied by piano-conductor short scores, reduced scores, lead sheets and lyric sheets. Music is found in the form of manuscripts, printed music, photocopies, and ozalids, often in multiple or different versions. In addition, the collection contains repertoire and program lists and other miscellaneous material, including a minimal amount of correspondence and photographs.

Scope and Content Note

Known as the “First Lady of Song,” Ella Fitzgerald sang professionally over a career that spanned some fifty-seven years. More than 2,300 recordings are known to exist of over 1,000 songs; Fitzgerald is thought to be more recorded than any other singer. Her repertoire included works from various genres, including musical theater, rhythm and blues, rock and roll, religious works, and Latin-American songs. Under the guidance of manager and producer, Norman Granz, Fitzgerald recorded several “songbooks” of the works of individual composers and lyricists.

The core of the Ella Fitzgerald Collection in the Library of Congress is the arrangements that were made for her by a group of more than fifty arrangers and orchestrators. The arrangers whose works are included in the collection include: Buddy Bregman, Benny Carter, Frank DeVol, Russ Garcia, Billy May, Marty Paich, Gerald Wilson, and, with the greatest number, Nelson Riddle.

Most arrangements in the collection are represented by a combination of full scores and parts, often with the addition of some combination of a piano-conductor short score, a reduced score, and a lead sheet or lyric sheet. The collection came to the Library with materials for each arrangement kept together in an envelope marked with a song title, a number (or numbers) assigned to that arrangement and, usually, the name of the arranger. These envelopes were kept in numeric order, which appears, for the most part, to represent a chronological filing system, with each new song arrangement being placed after the last. There are a few exceptions, however, where different arrangements of the same title were filed together but had been assigned different numbers.

There are both unnumbered arrangements in the collection and missing arrangements for which numbers are given in the index cards; we assume many of these are held at the other institutions mentioned in the introduction.

Folders may contain a combination of manuscript, printed music, photocopies or ozalids – sometimes multiples in different versions. If there is either some version of a full score and/or what appears to be a complete set of parts, then no particular note is made about a folder’s contents.

To find locations of arrangements within this finding aid, consult the Songs Index and Arrangers Index under Index Terms. The Songs Index provides an alphabetical title list of song arrangements that includes box/folder locations for each title. The Arrangers Index provides an alphabetical list of arrangers that includes their respective arrangements contained in this collection.
